NEW QUESTION: 1

You're managing a construction project to install several hundred air conditioner panels in a new office building. Every floor has identical panels. The customer, a construction contracting company, has provided specifications for the installations. The team is using a process to install and verify each panel. As the team completes each panel, your team's quality control inspector measures it and adds the data point to a control chart. You examine the control chart, and discover that the process is out of control and you need to take close look at it immediately. Which of the following BEST describes what you found on the control chart?

- A. At least seven consecutive measurements are inside of the control limits
- B. At least one point is inside of the control limits
- C. At least seven consecutive measurements are either above or below the mean but within the control limits
- D. At least one point is above or below the mean

Answer: C

Explanation:

A control chart is a really valuable tool for visualizing how a process is doing over time. By taking one measurement after another and plotting them on a line chart, you can get a lot of great information about the process. Every control chart has three important lines on it: the mean (or the average of all data points), an upper control limit and a lower control limit. There's an important rule called the Rule of Seven that helps you interpret control charts. That rule tells you that if you find seven consecutive measurements that are on the same side of the mean, there's something wrong. That's because it's extremely unlikely for seven measurements like that to occur - it's much more likely that there's a problem with your process. If you can figure out an improvement to fix that, you'll have a lot fewer defects to repair later!
