NEW QUESTION: 1

An SP core is running PIM on the network. Multicast groups in this network are in the 232.0.0.0/8 range.

Which command enables multicast routing operations without using an RP?

- A. ip pim autorp
- B. ip pim register-source

Which statement is true regarding the execution of the above SQL commands?

- A. The first CREATE TABLE command generates an error because CHECK and PRIMARY KEY constraints cannot be used for the same column.
- B. The first CREATE TABLE command generates an error because the NULL constraint is not valid.
- C. Both commands execute successfully.
- D. The first CREATE TABLE command generates an error because the column PROD_ID cannot be used in the PRIMARY KEY and FOREIGN KEY constraints.
- E. The second CREATE TABLE command generates an error because the CHECK constraint is not valid.

Answer: B

Explanation:

Defining Constraints

The slide gives the syntax for defining constraints when creating a table. You can create constraints at either the column level or table level. Constraints defined at the column level are included when the column is defined. Table-level constraints are defined at the end of the table definition and must refer to the column or columns on which the constraint pertains in a set of parentheses. It is mainly the syntax that differentiates the two; otherwise, functionally, a column-level constraint is the same as a table-level constraint.

NOT NULL constraints must be defined at the column level.

Constraints that apply to more than one column must be defined at the table level.
