Which three modes are the operating of HDLC? (Choose three)

- A. asynchronous client mode (ACM)
- B. Explanation:

Asynchronous response mode is an HDLC addition[1] for use overfull-duplex links. While retaining the primary/secondary distinction, it allows the secondary to transmit at any time. There are some subtleties about this mode of operation; while many features of the protocol do not care whether they are in a command or response frame, some do, and the address field of a received frame must be examined to determine whether it contains a command (the address received is ours) or a response (the address received is that of the other terminal).
